

You've earned digital credentials and gained new skills.

5 steps to take now

You've taken your first online course and earned digital credentials. Congratulations for upskilling yourself and taking the next step toward progressing your career! Digital credentials are the single source of truth verifying your skills and competencies. That's great, but now what? Here are five things to do next.

1. Share your new skills and achievements on social media

Let your colleagues, co-workers, and friends know about your achievements by posting on LinkedIn, Facebook, and other social media sites.

2. Update your resume and online portfolio

Digital credentials are verified proof of your new skills. Add your digital badges to your resume ASAP. That way, employers looking for candidates with your skills can find you.

3. Take the next step in learning

Is there a next course that can build on your new skills? Can you upskill even more? Learning doesn't have to stop with one course. Keep going! Look at recommended badges for further study.

4. Go for that promotion

Your company is making talent decisions based on verified skills. Let your manager or HR department know you've been honing your skills and share your digital credentials with them.

5. Look into the labor market

Where is the demand for people who have the skills you just earned? Check out the jobs associated with your new credentials on Credly's labor market insights.

Digital credentials are the common language of verified skills. Contact us today to learn more. Credly.com